HICKORY GROVE

Rosa Maxwell

Were you passing along Highway No. 133, about seven miles south-west of Crossett, Arkansas, you would probably exclaim, "Oh, what beautiful scenery!". Yes, you would be observing a vast pine forest of trees large and tall; and if, by chance, you detoured to the right and went about a quarter of a mile you would discover all alone in a large grove of hickory and cedar trees, almost hidden by their leafy branches, a small church called Hickory Grove. Were you to halt, get out and take a look, you would see scattered among these hickorys and cedars, white tombstones erected in memory of both young and old. Some of these tombstones will date as far back as the year 1867. Probably some of these old timers who are buried there remembered "When the stars fell" in 1832. Many of them served in the Civil War.

Through this cemetery runs a small branch. Some have said, in a joking way, that on the south side of this small branch are buried people who belonged to the Baptists, while on the north side were buried Methodists.

Now, this same little church that stands so calmly still there has not been there always. Long years ago, soon after the Civil war, during the reconstruction period, religious people of this community became eager for a place to worship God. Mr. L. Lang, who resides nearest this particular spot, contributed enough land to build a Methodist and Baptist church on. He also contributed lands for the cemetery. A short time after he had done this different members of the community helped to erect a small church of crudely sawed lumber. For benches they used hewed logs. After the church was completed and furnished in 1867, these old people enjoyed some of the "old time religion" that we've heard and sung about.

But, about twenty-five years later this little church began to fall. They erected another one of practically the same material as the one before. This one lasted only about ten years. Then they buiot the one that now stands. For a long time they worshiped in this church. Then somehow the members drifted apart and services were held there no longer. Some have wondered why no services were held there, except those of funerals, for about ten years, while others have had some ghostly ideas. They have thought that an insane man who lived near the church haunted it, and people were afraid to go near.

Finally, this superstition lifted from peoples minds and they have gone back to this little church, organized it, appointed a pastor, gained many new members, and are again enjoying the "Old time religion" that we've heard and sung about.
